the beginning of the end." He adds that only the south of Sevas. topol is taken, or rather destroyed, and that the north remains to be invested; and that to do this the basis of operations upon Kamtesch and Balaklava has to be abandoned, and a new one secured. A winter campaign in the Crimea is still the prospect. The Allied success would be followed by "a war by blockade." In that case, he intimates, our Government must look to its rights, and particularly to the doctrine of "free ships, free goods," which we, in common with the Northern Powers, have declared.
